Pacific Asia Museum Announces 40 Years of Building the Pacific Asia Museum Collection, a New Exhibition Featuring Treasures from Asia and the Pacific Islands

June 13, Pasadena, CA – Pacific Asia Museum announces a new exhibition, 40 Years of Building the Pacific Asia Museum Collection, on view beginning July 8 through October 9, 2011. This exhibition provides an opportunity for visitors to Pacific Asia Museum to view over 50 of the most important objects in the collection, many of which are not on regular display because of their sensitivity to light. Currently celebrating its 40th Anniversary, the museum organized the exhibition to demonstrate the extraordinary range and quality of its art collection.

Since 1971, Pacific Asia Museum has carefully built its collection through a combination of purchases and strategically targeted donations. David Kamansky, Director from 1977 through 2003, was instrumental in acquiring much of the museum’s collection of over 14,000 works of art and artifacts from Asia and the Pacific Islands. Today, the museum boasts especially significant holdings in East Asian paintings, ceramics and textiles, Himalayan Buddhist art, Pacific Islands sculpture and ethnographic art.

Among the highlights of the exhibition is Eagle in a Snowstorm (1848), a painting by the Japanese master painter and printmaker Katsushika Hokusai. This scroll originally came from the Harari collection, a
A major collection of Japanese paintings and drawings that was given to the museum by several donors beginning in 1986. Hokusai drew inspiration from nature but his intent was not to simply create a realistic portrayal of an eagle. Rather, the image is symbolic and conveys qualities such as nobility, strength and singularity. The intensity of the bird’s gaze and the strength of its talons reflect its determination to survive despite harsh conditions. Extended to the metaphoric level, the painting is a reflection of a human condition that rings as true for us today as it did in mid-19th century Japan.

Another treasure in the exhibition is Bodhisattva in Yab-yum Embrace, a wooden Chinese sculpture in Tibetan style from the Yongle period of the Ming Dynasty (1404 – 1425) that depicts the “father-mother embrace”. This embrace symbolizes the union between Compassion and Wisdom, the two most important concepts in Tibetan Buddhism. When Compassion and Wisdom are joined, as represented by the union of a male bodhisattva and his consort, one can achieve enlightenment. Although this masterpiece was created for a Tibetan Buddhist audience in the 15th century, the ideals that it embodies are still understood and valued by many cultures around the world, transcending time.

Canoes were essential for inter-island travel in Papua New Guinea and still remain a vital mode of transportation in the lives of many Pacific Islanders. Canoes were also objects of ritual and ceremonial gift exchange known as kula. Because canoes were essential to daily life over thousands of years, they were carved by skilled artists who passed their techniques down from generation to generation. Adorned with symbolic details, the double-lobed early 20th century Canoe Prow with Pigments from the Trobriand Islands of New Guinea would have deflected the spray of the waves and protected the occupants of the canoes, both physically and spiritually. Canoe Prow with Pigments is one of the highlighted objects representing art from the Pacific Islands that is on view in the exhibition.

The works of art in 40 Years of Building the Pacific Asia Museum Collection span more than 1200 years and represent a large cross-section of art from across Asia and the Pacific region. The objects and the exhibition were carefully chosen to resonate with each other and with the objects in the museum’s new introductory gallery, completed earlier this year and opened to the public in March. The introductory gallery currently contains an exhibition titled The Art of Pacific Asia. Topics addressed in the display include the geography of Asia, materials and techniques, religion in art and ceremonies and rituals. The combination of 40 Years of Building the Pacific Asia Museum Collection and The Art of Pacific Asia is intended to deepen the understanding of art from Asia and the Pacific Islands and also delight the eyes of all visitors to Pacific Asia Museum.
